The Scottish Public Services Ombudsman is responsible for looking at complaints about most public services in Scotland and for helping these bodies improve their complaints handling.

I have put on record elsewhere that I have concerns that the integration of health and social care agenda is moving forward much more quickly than discussions about the related complaints processes<sup>1</sup>. This may mean that a person receiving care and support from a single provider (health or local government) has to access more than one complaints process to raise their concerns because, while the service is delivered by one provider, more than one body retains responsibility for different aspects of that service.

My detailed concerns and the reason why this is a particular issue for any matter delegated between health and local government are set out in responses to previous consultations and I do not intend to repeat those here. However, I did want to put on record my concern that this consultation does not appear to clearly address how, when matters are delegated, the person receiving care is helped to understand what that means for them. I have noted that the briefing note of May 2012, the Scottish Government laid out an expectation that bodies would communicate clearly to staff and stakeholders, and in so doing eliminate the potential confusion over responsibility for particular functions.

Good communication is critical. However, it is not always sufficient in and of itself. For person-centred care to be fully achieved, it is essential that the system is set up clearly and comprehensibly so that the individual can understand who is accountable; why that person is accountable and how to hold them to account. This is particularly important when the person involved may be vulnerable. It can be very difficult for a person to trust a decision if they feel that the lines of accountability are not clear. This is clearly significant when the purpose is to provide some oversight or independent review to protect a potentially vulnerable person.

It should, therefore, be the case that when deciding whether or not some powers should be delegated, public organisations should be obliged to make sure that, in considering the impact on users, this should include how users will be able to complain about the service.
